SKATING .- Skating is an ancient pase, if we may believe the books. It is mer oned in the Edda, written eight hundred ears ago, in which the god Eller is repreented as distinguished by his beauty, arrow and skates. Klopstock has sung its praises in several odes ; Goethe, Herder, and other German poets have celebrated it. As a bealth giving exercise it stands pre-eminent, bring ing the body into action through a variety of motions, and exhibiting in a marked degree the comparative ease and grace possessed by those who venture upon a trial of

The hest skators, it is said, are found i Holland, Germany and Russia. In Holland, as is well known, both men and women use skates as a means of locomotion from one village to another, and on market days the rivers are lined with persons gliding to and from the market towns. There ladies universally practice the amovement, not only as a recreation, but as a part of the gymnastic course of training to which females, as well as males, are in that country submitted. Night after night they may be seen, sometimes with gentlemen, and again alone, "like the Homeric gods, striding with winged feet over the sea, transmuted into solid ground."

It is only within a few years, that skating has reached what may be termed the fashlonable circles of society in this country.
